ONE DAY AND ANOTHER A Lyrical Eclogue PART I LATE SPRING The mottled moth at eventide Beats glimmering wings against the pane; The slow, sweet lily opens wide, White in the dusk like some dim stain; The garden dreams on every side And breathes faint scents of rain: Among the flowering stocks they stand; A crimson rose is in her hand. I Outside her garden. He waits musing: Herein the dearness of her is; The thirty perfect days of June Made one, in maiden loveliness Were not more sweet to clasp and kiss, With love not more in tune. Ah me! I think she is too true, Too spiritual for lifes rough way: So say her eyes, --her soul looks through, Two bluet blossoms, watchet-blue, Are not more pure than they. So kind, so beautiful is she, So soft and white, so fond and fair, Sometimes my heart fears she may be Not long for Earth, and secredy Sweet sister to the air. II Dusk deepens. A whippoorwill calls. The whippoorwills are calling where The golden west is graying; Tis time, they say, to meet him there--Why are you still delaying He waits you where the old beech throws Its gnarly shadow over Wood violet and the bramble rose, Frail lady-fern and clover. Where elder and the sumac peep Above your gardens paling, Whereon, at noon, the lizards sleep, Like lichen on the railing. Come! ere the early rising moons Gold floods the violet valleys;...
