We wish to know what so impelled the tone-poet to boundless desperation, to extravagant jubilation; we seek an explanation from the mysteriously beautiful features of this sphinx. The necessity obtrudes itself the more when the music becomes more and more finely subtilized, as in Beethoven s last period. It is not the purpose of this paper to discuss systematically the philosophy and aesthetics of music, but rather merely to call the attention of the reader to certain phases of these subjects, for it is the general confusioa of ideas pertaining to music that is to be regretted. The clear vision of modern investigation has eliminated much that was often mere nonsense but, veiled in mysterious language, passed for wisdom. It has emphasized the necessity of considering every art as inseparable from its own peculiar medium of expression, instead of attempting to explain all the arts from the same standpoint, or at least of applying certain principles to each and all. To classify the principles of any art, especially music, is as difficult a task as that of classifying the religious emotions of humanity. If a religion, as expounded by its founder, be the expression of the so-called belief of a certain class, shall we say that an art is likewise the expression of the belief of a class in the views of its founder or founders--if it were possible actually to discover such a parallel relation? Or shall...
